"The Company We Keep"

Last Monday, sitting around that long table at the cluster meeting, he spoke of an old friend. In her ninety-fourth year, she was asked, "What have you learned in recent years?" She remarked with a twinkle, "Peer pressure is less than it used to be."

Often, peer pressure is viewed like the flu, something to avoid. Remember Mom, or was it Dad, questioning you after some numbskull decision, "Well, if those friends of yours told you to jump off a bridge, would you?" It was as if we should side-step others' influence because something bad was likely to happen. After all, it just had. Behind the admonition, of course, resided hope that we learn to think before we act, reflect on consequences and remember who we are. In early life, when the sense of immortality is on steroids, that's a tall order.

But later in life, we can also slip. Someone questions the integrity of a colleague and, without thinking, we follow suit with our own belittling critique. Others aren't pulling their weight on the committee assignment so we cut back our effort. We don't like the decision the church officers made. We withhold our gifts; even invite others to join us. Sometimes, we don't think. Peer pressure becomes our pass to being less than our best selves.

There is that other side, however. There is the older woman living alone on her meager retirement. She doesn't get her hair done and contributes the price of a permanent to the youth going to fix houses in Joplin. There is the church which, though dwindling in numbers, has the gigantic vision of giving their building to a new charter school. They believe God wants them to see that kids in the community have a better opportunity to succeed early on and later as well. The peer may be one, a woman living alone. She prompts your imagining what you might do. The peers may be a congregation willing to act on what they sense God wants for children. Because of them, you think about what God wants your church to do.

Who challenges you to be better than you would be without them? Keeping them in the company you keep is succumbing to peer pressure in the best way possible.

Grace always,

Bill

PRESBYTERIAN DISASTER ASSISTANCE

Presbyterian Disaster Assistance (PDA) is a mission program of PC(USA)

Q: It's 10 o'clock on the morning after a storm or an earthquake. Can you locate your church members, especially the vulnerable ones? If members of your church are displaced from their homes, how will you know if they are dead or alive, injured or unhurt? How will you be able to contact them?

A: Every congregation needs multiple ways to contact members. That means, for cases of displacement, you need contact information for each member's likely destination (relatives? friends?). Hurricane Katrina taught Gulf-area churches and presbyteries this need, but we too need to be ready. Collect that contact information NOW and put it where you can find it at church and also offsite in the hands of key members and staff!

By thinking these things through now, you may be able to keep an emergency from becoming a disaster.
